Ozone at the ground level (a key component of atmospheric pollution) is associated with many health problems such as decreased pulmonary function, increased hospitalizations and emergency visits to asthma and increases in premature deaths. The factors affecting the formation of ozone include heat, precursor chemicals concentrations and methane emissions. The concentrations of particulate matter are affected by fire emissions and air stagnation episodes, among other factors. By increasing these different factors, climate change is designed to lead to higher levels of ozone and particulate material in some regions. Increases in global temperatures can cause associated increases in premature deaths related to the worst pollution of ozone and particles. Estimates that assume that no change in the regulatory controls or characteristics of the population ranged from 1,000 to 4,300 additional premature deaths nationally per year up to 2050 of combined effects for the health of ozone and particles. There is less certainty about the responses of particles in the air to climate change than the response of the ozone. The health-related costs of the current effects of ozone air pollution that exceed national standards were estimated at $6.5 billion (in 2008, US dollars) across the country, based on a US assessment of the health impacts of ozone levels during 2000-2002. Watch a small video about air quality changes and learn what communities can do to prepare.
